TOWARD A MORMON JURISPRUDENCE

John W. Welch*

Many lawyers and law students are interested in the intersection of their religious faith and values with their responsibilities and duties in the legal profession. The mere fact that many people intuitively sense a connection between law and religion is prima facie evidence that these domains are at least relevant to each other, if not fundamentally linked.

In this Article, I hope to make a pioneering contribution to the intellectual progress of my own religious tradition, Mormonism. Recent political events have amplified the fact that to many Americans, Mormonism is still seen today as a bizarre religion, or worse, a "cult with a heretical understanding of Scripture and doctrine." This Article does not seek to answer such criticisms² or to explain Mormon tenets, as is readily available elsewhere. Instead, this Article explores a broad jurisprudential perspective of the relatively young religion that is very rich in potential and now emerging more often on national and international scenes. This Article raises the following questions: what would a Mormon jurisprudence look like? How would one recognize a Mormon jurisprudence? What would distinguish it from other jurisprudential approaches? My comments will necessarily be brief and introductory. I will strive to say something, without saying too little or too much. Much remains to be said and done along this line of inquiry, though a start has been made.⁴

In outlining the basics of a Mormon jurisprudence, I am entering into a broader conversation that has been ongoing for some time. Catholics and Protestants are respected for wrestling to understand jurisprudence in terms of the premises and beliefs of their respective faiths; serious Jewish, Buddhist, and Islamic contributions are also welcomed.⁵ Rigorous Mormon efforts should be no less regarded and may have much to offer in today's world.

I. What a Mormon Jurisprudence is Not

Consider first what a Mormon jurisprudence is not. For one thing, it would need to be more than a jurisprudence that just happens to be composed by a Mormon. Just because a song is written by a Mormon, a Baptist, or a Jew, does not necessarily make it a Mormon, Baptist, or Jewish song. And while Mormons may well have the greater interest in and access to Mormon ideas than do others, a Mormon jurisprudence could be developed or articulated by a member of another faith. I have benefited from my long-standing membership in the Jewish Law Association and from my associations with biblical scholars of many faiths in the Society of Biblical Literature as I attempt to explain elements of Jewish jurisprudence or Biblical law to my law students at Brigham Young University. I would hope that scholars of other faiths might find Mormon thought worthy of study in a similar outsider fashion. The works of non-Mormon scholars such as Jan Shipps,⁶

⁶ See JAN SHIPPS, MORMONISM: THE STORY OF A NEW RELIGIOUS TRADITION (1985) (explaining the chronology and development of the Mormon tradition).

Douglas Davies,⁷ and a number of others⁸ show this is possible. It might even help to articulate a better Mormon jurisprudence if it were coauthored by Mary Ann Glendon or some other sympathetic collaborator.⁹

At the same time, it is doubtful that any Mormon jurisprudence will ever receive an official stamp of approval from the leadership of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints or any other church in the Mormon tradition. Whether one sees jurisprudence as a branch of philosophy and ethics, social science, psychology, or anthropology, an official Latter-day Saint jurisprudence would no sooner exist than any officially sanctioned approach to philosophy, economics, or any other academic discipline. Latter-day Saint scripture, doctrine, ideas, and assumptions, of course, will and should influence any Mormon thinker who engages the mind with the perennially perplexing problems of jurisprudence, but one should not expect any Latter-day Saint leader to speak $ex\ cathedra^{10}$ or to issue a $nihil\ obstat^{11}$ regarding approaches and solutions to jurisprudential issues and topics.

Thus, using the word "Mormon" (instead of "Latter-day Saint") is preferable in this situation. The term "Mormon" is best used in reference to cultural phenomena, such as the Mormon Tabernacle Choir, the Mormon Trail, Mormon history, or Mormon weddings. The term "Latter-day Saint" is better reserved for official doctrines, policies, or programs of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. ¹³

When one goes looking for a Mormon jurisprudence, one is looking for more than a description of Mormon historical experiences with the law (Joseph Smith's numerous appearances in court, 14 antipolygamy jurisprudence goes beyond the historical and political domain, probing into questions of theory and meaning.

In the Western tradition, jurisprudence typically asks: what is truth? What is law? How does law differ from custom or manners? What is justice? What are rights? It produces books like Ronald Dworkin's Taking Rights Seriously.²² Western tradition asks: what constitutes an actionable offense? What is causation? What is intention? What is legitimate? Why do bad things happen to good people? When and why do we punish? What do we mean by equality?

A Mormon jurisprudence would, of course, offer its answers to such questions. But at the same time, a Mormon jurisprudence would not just begin or end with the questions that Western jurisprudence has preferred to ask. We should not expect every tradition to ask the same questions. In addition to the questions typically posed by Western tradition, a Mormon jurisprudence would be more inclined to ask: what is goodness? What is love? How does law differ from covenants or principles? What is mercy? What are duties? It might produce a book titled Taking Duties Seriously. What constitutes repentance and restitution? What is responsibility? What is free agency? What is authority? It questions why bad things happen at all.²³ When and how do we offer assistance? What do we mean by equanimity and harmony? In sum, Mormon jurisprudence asks overlooked questions, advancing these often underrepresented topics.

In exploring and answering such questions, a Mormon jurisprudence would not be an American jurisprudence or a British jurisprudence. Mormonism is both a worldwide and an eternally oriented movement. Thus, Mormons must begin thinking in terms of "Mormon jurisprudences"—members of the Latter-day Saint Church, as jurists in various countries and cultures, must work to understand and utilize principles of the gospel within the context of their own legal system. The number of Latter-day Saints in South and Central America now rivals those in North America, and those Latin countries follow a jurisprudence much more closely tied to the civil law tradition, which, as Harvard Law Professor Mary Ann Glendon ("Professor Glendon") has noted, places emphasis on "equality and fraternity (or, as we would say today, solidarity)"; whereas Anglo-American thinkers place "greater emphasis on individual liberty and property."²⁴ Dallin H. Oaks, now a high-ranking Latter-day Saint church official and previously a law professor, university president, and member of the Utah Supreme Court, was surprised to learn that the concept of a fiduciary is quite foreign to Mormons coming out of civil law backgrounds; this situation means that different presumptions might apply when explaining to these people doctrinal concepts such as stewardship, to say nothing of the practical assumptions involved in training them to handle funds as fiduciaries. Local differences aside, a Mormon jurisprudence must also begin thinking in terms that transcend and unify Mormon jurisprudential thought across all cultures. Will that be in a universal, catholic (little "c") sense, or in a worldwide, umbrella or tabernacle sense? One would suspect the latter.

Various approaches to law are taken in different cultures, reflecting to a large extent the received views of those cultures on the ultimate characteristics and values of the human condition and civilization.²⁵ Accordingly, a Mormon jurisprudence would not be independent of Latter-day Saint ideals and values. The insights of comparative anthropology may be helpful. In ancient Greece, individualism, rationality, debate, the city-state, public opinion, creativity, choice, and adventure predominated. These values have heavily influenced Western jurisprudence,²⁶ although not always beneficially. Professor Glendon rightly said, the extreme form of "hyper-individualism" sends the message that rights are absolute "without responsibilities, . . . in radical isolation from other individuals, freedom from the past, and recklessness toward the future."27 In ancient Israel, a different set of legal norms and concepts arose in the Jewish tradition because such values as collective responsibility, law (torah, "teaching," or "instruction"), holiness, purification, belonging to God, brotherhood, redemption, remembrance, and wisdom were of the essence.²⁸ In China, however, concepts of decorum, self-control, relationships, interdependence, ceremony, mediation, persuasion, conciliation, conscience, and harmony with nature's events have traditionally prevailed.²⁹ In India, concepts of caste, purity, cosmic order, dharma, conformity, allotment, and the performance of inherent duties have shaped thinking about social order.³⁰ In Japan, honor, rules of behavior, prestige, courage, endurance, and loyalty are preeminent.³¹ In all cultures, whether in Africa or in Islam, other arrays of values shape and give distinctive textures to jurisprudence and law in each of these societies. Thus, it is fair to begin asking what factors will emerge at the crux or bedrock of a Mormon jurisprudence. By studying comparative jurisprudence, we may well learn how to recognize those still implicit contours of a Mormon jurisprudence.

Finally, it is worth clarifying that a jurisprudence is not the same thing as an ideology, but it is not easy to sustain the distinction between the two. Jurisprudence asks how we think, not what we think. In this regard, this Article turns attention to three fundamental features that would significantly shape any Mormon jurisprudence. First, such a jurisprudence would be rooted in Mormon scripture. Second, such a jurisprudence would be inclusive, though not eclectic. And third, such a jurisprudence would be fundamentally pluralistic, though not polycentric.

II. ROOTED IN MORMON SCRIPTURE

Whatever else one may say, a Mormon jurisprudence must be based solidly in scripture; and, indeed, Latter-day Saint scriptures are filled with seminal statements about the nature and operation of law, both divine and human, spiritual and temporal. Studying scripture will be the closest ally of Mormon jurisprudence, and not just a casual level of scripture study, or a selective proof-text approach of pulling out one's favorite passage as an aphoristic touchstone. Flimsy readings will not bear the needed weight in order to function as part of a jurisprudence.

A primary issue then becomes, "And what is scripture?" The premises of a Mormon jurisprudence must be based in the first instance in all Latter-day Saint canonical works, namely the Old and New Testaments, the Book of Mormon, The Doctrine and Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price. Blaborations may be found in intentional, relevant statements by high-ranking Latter-day Saints church leaders, but these may be less universally applicable than the canonical revelations. As is done in Jewish law, which recognizes levels of authority between Torah, Mishnah, Gemara, midrash, responsa, and so on,³⁴ a Mormon jurisprudence will eventually need to articulate its own "rules of recognition" among its various kinds of scriptural statements. And indeed, inconveniently, Mormons do not believe in a monolithic concept of scripture.³⁵

No scripture is for personal interpretation³⁶ and yet neither is it self-interpreting. A Mormon jurisprudence will need to extract from the body of scripture "correct principles" that will appropriately govern human life.³⁷ Unique rules of Mormon interpretation may in time be developed. Rules of statutory construction exist in the American legal tradition,38 and the Jewish tradition has rules for analyzing and resolving halachic disputes.³⁹ How will Mormons go about the task of finding, revealing, distilling, articulating, understanding, or applying correct principles? How should that process differ from the procedures followed in other jurisprudences? These questions remain open because the sources of jurisprudential wisdom in each and all of the scriptures are copious and variegated. But what is clear is that Mormon scripture will play a preeminent role in that process. If an idea cannot be located and substantiated within the purview of scripture, the idea may still be true, but it probably should not be counted as particularly or bindingly Mormon.

In this process, the scriptures must be carefully and broadly studied. A passage's original intent is important, but so is its reception, history, and its use as canon within Mormon communities. In his article on viewing criminal sanctions through Latter-day Saint thought, Martin Gardner, a Latter-day Saint law professor at the University of Nebraska College of Law, leans heavily on The Doctrine and Covenants Section 42, which tells Mormon leaders that if one of their members commits a crime "he or she shall be delivered up unto the law of the land." But this still leaves us wondering, what does that scripture tell us about what kinds of punishment the state should impose?

Marguerite Driessen, another Latter-day Saint legal educator, responding to Professor Gardner, invoked the Pauline mantra, "by the law no flesh is justified." ⁴¹ But the words and meanings of the Greek word nomos, like the English word law, are legion and often misleading, so I and most New Testament scholars are still puzzling over what Paul meant. ⁴²

Likewise, one must wonder: what was the Book of Mormon prophet Nephi's intent when he said that "all are alike unto God"?⁴³ His pronouncement sounds like the beginnings of a jurisprudence of critical race theory,⁴⁴ but how revolutionary and transformational is Mormonism?⁴⁵ Indeed, Joseph Smith said that Mormonism will revolutionize the world, but by making all men friends.⁴⁶

Does Lehi, another Book of Mormon prophet, agree with Plato's Philebus that pleasure is the purpose of life and basis of a jurisprudence when he says, "[M]en are, that they might have joy"?⁴⁷ Not likely. But what did Lehi mean?

What is the scriptural content of the doctrine of agency? Latter-day Saint Michael Young, former dean and professor of comparative law and jurisprudence at George Washington University Law School, rightly detects the centrality of free will as a philosophical principle in a Mormon jurisprudence.⁴⁸ But one must still ask, how free are we really, given the inevitability of most consequences?⁴⁹

Perhaps most directly pertinent to the law, legal cases in the scriptures need to be carefully analyzed: what rules of law and holdings emerge from the scriptural account of the trial and execution of Naboth;⁵⁰ of the action of Boaz on behalf of Ruth;⁵¹ from the trial of Jeremiah at the temple;⁵² or in the Book of Mormon, the case of Sherem against Jacob;⁵³ or the trials of Abinadi, Nehor, or Korihor;⁵⁴ The same could be asked of the trials of Jesus, Paul, and others.⁵⁵ Why are there so many legal cases in the scriptures, and what would a Mormon jurisprudence draw from them?

Equally difficult to understand—historically, linguistically, literarily, comparatively, collectively, and practically—are the various and often conflicting or changing bodies of rules or legal codes in the scriptures. What is one to make today of Jehovah's rules of judicial ethics found at the end of the Code of Covenant in Exodus 23,56 or the concept of social justice found in the laws of Deuteronomy,⁵⁷ or the legal elements concerning divorce and perjury in the Sermon on the Mount,⁵⁸ or the statement published as The Doctrine and Covenants Section 134 on government?⁵⁹ One must look carefully at these issues, not only to determine what the word "kill" or "false witness" actually meant in Hebrew in the Ten Commandments, but also what the implications of those meanings are. Does one cheer (can one cheer, should one cheer) when it becomes clear that Section 134 of the The Doctrine and Covenants reflects Madisonian constructions of revolution, natural law, and freedom of conscience?⁶⁰

The scriptures are filled with laws, teachings, statutes, ordinances, commandments, and testimonies, in all their varieties. Legal topics in the scriptures often appear or are assumed in prophetic texts, revelations, ethical admonitions, speeches, sermons, proverbs, parables, psalms, histories, and narratives. In many ways, the Mormon scriptural package is endless. Exactly what do these texts say? And not say? Is there a scriptural position on tolerance? On struggle and resistance? On analogical reasoning? On legal analysis? On collective intention? On social choice? On human dignity? On the boundaries of democratic pluralism? Unpacking it all remains a daunting task. But herein lies an important recognition of the next main observation concerning the open-endedness of a Mormon jurisprudence.

III. NOT RANDOM OR ECLECTIC, BUT INCLUSIVE

In 1931, the German mathematician Gödel proved an important hypothesis known as the incompleteness theorem.⁶² He demonstrated that any system can be either complete or consistent, but not both.⁶³ Applying his theorem to systems of thought, it has been noted that systematic theologies and strictly rational philosophies may well achieve a satisfying sense of internal consistency, but they do so at the expense of completeness. The standard objections to Aquinas' naturalism, Kant's idealism, or Hart's positivism is that they exclude too much of the picture of life,⁶⁴ saying more and more about less and less, until they say virtually everything about nothing. Abstractions may be clean and clear, but they are also just that, extractions of selected parts from an unmanageable and perhaps naturally inconsistent whole. And the answer is not, with critical legal studies,⁶⁵ or perhaps legal polycentrism,⁶⁶ to say less and less about more and more, until one is left to say nothing about everything.

Mormon thought, in contrast, privileges fullness, abundance, completeness, and all that the Father has, even if that means that Mormon thought, like Mormon life, appears to be overloaded, inconsistent, in many ways rationally unprovable and torn by competing values and obligations that pull, stretch, and expand in many ways. This may produce episodes of cognitive dissonance, ethical quandaries, confusion, mystery, and unknowability, but Mormonism boldly recognizes that there must be an opposition in all things, 67 including rationality and irrationality, as paradoxical as that may seem. 68

Faced with a choice, a Mormon jurisprudence will always prefer fullness over mere coherence, choosing to circumscribe all truth into one great whole. For this very reason, Joseph Smith objected to the limiting effects of denominational creeds, rational and consistent though they may be: "I want to come up into the presence of God, and learn all things; but the creeds set up stakes, and say, 'Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further'..."⁶⁹

A logical result of this inclusivism can be found in one of the basic impulses of Mormonism—gathering.⁷⁰ Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, the first two Presidents of the Latter-day Saints Church, gathered people from various places to Kirtland and Nauvoo, to Utah and Zion. But the principle of gathering embraces not only gathering groups of people but also bodies of truth. Brigham Young once said:

It is our duty and calling, as ministers of the same salvation and Gospel, to gather every item of truth and reject every error. Whether a truth be found with professed infidels, or with the Universalists, or the Church of Rome, or the Methodists, the Church of England, the Presbyterians, the Baptists, the Quakers, the Shakers, or any other of the various and numerous different sects and parties, all of whom have more or less truth, it is the business of the Elders of this Church (Jesus, their Elder Brother, being at their head) to gather up all the truths in the world pertaining to life and salvation, to the Gospel we preach, to mechanism of every kind, to the sciences, and to philosophy, wherever it may be found in every nation, kindred, tongue, and people and bring it to Zion.⁷¹

Some people will say that a Mormon jurisprudence is eclectic. But there is a difference between being eclectic and being open or willing to be inclusive. A Mormon "rule of inclusion" may need to be developed. It will fall back, at a minimum, onto the Mormon concept of scripture, which is both open and canonical, transcendent and immanent.

As a Mormon jurisprudence reads various theories of law, it will find useful elements in each that are true and can be supported by scripture:

Divine Law Theory. Divine law theory will certainly be a primary part of this mix.⁷² God is a lawgiver in the Bible. Furthermore, the Doctrine and Covenants Section 88:42 expansively affirms, "[God] hath given a law unto all things,"⁷³ and Section 130:20 fundamentally speaks of a law "irrevocably decreed in heaven before the foundations of this world."⁷⁴ Moreover, Joseph Smith clearly asserted, God "was the first Author of law."⁷⁵

Natural Law Theory. Natural law theory will have its solid truths to offer and is therefore an essential part of a Mormon jurisprudence. Law naturally exists to some extent independent even of God, for in Alma's reductio ad absurdum, if God somehow were to be unjust, "God would cease to be God." God is also bound when people do what he says. Law is necessary, Lehi argued: "if . . . there is no law there is no God." And in some sense, law or its effects are immutable or fixed: "[a]nd again, verily I say unto you, he hath given a law unto all things, by which they move in their times and their seasons; [a]nd their courses are fixed, even the courses of the heavens and the earth, which comprehend the earth and all the planets."

Legal Idealism. Idealist views of law seem enticing, for God is a God of order.⁸¹ He invites us to come and reason together with him.⁸² But he reminds us that his thoughts are not our thoughts.⁸³ Still, law strives for ideal harmony, and "[t]he law of the Lord is [ideally] perfect."⁸⁴

Legal Positivism. Positivist formulations abound in Mormon scripture and rhetoric. On one hand, God's sovereign commands are coupled with explicit sanctions (as epitomizes the positivist jurisprudence of John Austin⁸⁵) and on the other hand, with rewards upon that which blessing is predicated.⁸⁶ In the Book of Mormon, Lehi even goes as far to say that where there is no law, there is no punishment.⁸⁷

Sociology. Sociological theories of jurisprudence look to the instrumental values of law in furthering the purposes of life, in promoting the inner order of human associations, or strengthening the conditions of social solidarity.⁸⁸ Similarly, the intellectual generativeness of Mormon scriptures on social order, the plan of salvation, the purpose of life, community, Zion, and the relativity of revelations in different dispensations and languages all invite sociological insights into a Mormon jurisprudence.

Pragmatism. Pragmatic views of law are prescriptive (as in the jurisprudence of John Chipman Gray⁸⁹); so are the scriptural "be ye therefores" and the rules of conduct prescribed for members of the church throughout scripture.⁹⁰

Legal Realism. Even legal realism may have a place in a Mormon jurisprudence. Realist views are predictive, or at least attempt to predict future judicial outcomes based on past experience (as in the work of Oliver Wendell Holmes and Karl Llewellyn⁹¹). Likewise, the prophecies about how the final judgment will proceed and what the consequences of human choices will be are also predictive.⁹²

Psychology and Phenomenology. Psychological and phenomenological constructs of law⁹³ seem consonant with the scriptural injunctions to find and do justice, not in or with law books and past precedents, but "in the fear of the Lord, faithfully, and with a perfect heart."⁹⁴

And so it goes: wherever truth may be found, it will be embraced and utilized by a Mormon jurisprudence. Jurisprudential conflict usually stems from different answers to the following question: where do we look for truth? Various theories provide answers such as universality, 95 consistency, 96 rationality, 97 stateability, 98 as well as enforceability, predictability, or measurability. Others say, look to experience; but to whose experience do we look? Again, various answers range from looking to the experience of the courts, 99 of officials, 100 of legislators, 101 of ordinary citizens, or of social scientists. 102 A Mormon jurisprudence would not exclude a priori any of these answers and would include others as well, which leads to one final main point.

IV. FUNDAMENTALLY PLURALISTIC

As one may readily discern from the foregoing discussion of the Latter-day Saint concept of open canon and from the strong Latter-day Saint preference for fullness, the main philosophical assumptions that will drive the engine of a Mormon jurisprudence are all distinguished by a strong inclination, not necessarily toward pluralism, but toward pluralistic manifolds.

Over the years, I have spoken with many scholars of various faiths. These discussions have made me keenly aware that words and phrases, concepts and presuppositions, all of which seem perfectly obvious and intuitively valid to me, may mean something completely different, or perhaps even nothing at all, to a person of another persuasion. Frequently, this results in frustration, misrepresentation, or abandonment of the topic.

As I sat listening to intellectual ships passing in the night, it dawned on me why so many points of disjunction exist between Mormonism and traditional Christian orthodoxy. The common element present in Evangelical objections against Mormon thought is this: Evangelicals, including such notables as C. S. Lewis, are monists, where Mormons are pluralists. Over and over again, Mormon doctrine relishes multiplicity. Many words found in traditional Christianity are principally understood in the singular; whereas, the same words in Mormon doctrine are predominantly understood as plurals¹⁰³: priesthoods and priesthood offices;¹⁰⁴ kingdoms, powers, and principalities;¹⁰⁵ intelligences, two creations, and worlds without number;¹⁰⁶ hosts of heaven; messengers;¹⁰⁷ continuing revelations and gifts of the spirit;¹⁰⁸ scriptures, dispensations, covenants, ordinances, two Jerusalems, and two deaths; heavens;¹⁰⁹ degrees of glory;¹¹⁰ many

¹⁰⁹ Matthew 5:3, 10:10, 6:9 (King James, The Church of Latter-day Saints). Although "heaven" is used in the singular in both the New International version and the King James version as published by The Church of the Latter-day Saints, Mormon doctrines rely on the

"mansions";111 eternal lives; and even, in certain senses, saviours,112 and gods. 113 It is second nature for Latter-day Saints to think, comfortably, in terms of manifold pluralities. In contrast, it is first nature for Evangelicals to think, readily, in terms of singularity: one kingdom, one scripture, one priesthood of all believers, one saving act, and one sanctifying human response of faith to God's singular grace. 114

The debate over whether truth, reality, being, and matter are ultimately one or many has a very long and sagacious history. Greek philosophy traces its earliest origins to the debate over whether essence is ultimately one or many. Parmenides, Heraclitus, Thales, Anaximander, Democritus, and others argued over whether matter is one or many, and if many, how many. 115 Medieval alchemists subscribed to the view that matter was essentially homogenous, so one form of matter could be transmuted into another. 116 Newtonian science, Bohr's atomic theory, and now high energy nuclear physics, have offered views on ultimate valences of matter. 117 Scientific models, of course, do not control theology, but they do provide points of reference in understanding the nature of existence, or better said, of existences. Mormon thought would come down on the side of the pluralists in several important ways:

Epistemology. A Mormon jurisprudence will draw on multiple sources of knowledge. Logic, reason, and rationalism are sources of

- ¹¹⁴ This should come as no surprise, since Evangelicalism is firmly rooted in Protestantism and its general affirmation of the five "solas": sola scriptura (scripture alone), solus Christus (Christ alone), sola gratia (grace alone), sola fide (faith alone), and sola Deo gloria (glory to God only).

GRAHAM, EXPLAINING THE COSMOS: THE IONIAN TRADITION OF SCIENTIFIC PHILOSOPHY 186, 220-23 (2006) (positing a new practice of cosmology, which, according to the standard interpretation of Anaxagoras' and Empedocles' later Ionian philosophy, is best termed Eleatic pluralism).

knowledge, judgment, and wisdom, but they are not exclusive sources. Revelation, inspiration, spirituality, and emotion are among sources of knowledge that all have important places at the Mormon jurisprudential roundtable. None of these places necessarily hold the right to trump the input of any of the other places, although in matters of reason, the rules of reason trump, and in matters of revelation, gifts of the spirit would hold sway. As I have written elsewhere, both are necessary: just as it takes two hands to play a violin, it takes both mind and spirit to approach truth.¹¹⁸ One must "seek learning, even by study and also by faith."¹¹⁹ Thus, I am dubious of compartmentalization.¹²⁰

Cosmology. A Mormon jurisprudence presumes a complex layering of multiple worlds or kingdoms, which necessarily entails multiple laws. Especially important and interesting is the revelation in The Doctrine and Covenants, which reads:

All kingdoms have a law given; [a]nd there are many kingdoms; for there is no space in the [sic] which there is no kingdom; and there is no kingdom in which there is no space, either a greater or a lesser kingdom. And unto every kingdom is given a law; and unto every law there are certain bounds also and conditions. All beings who abide not in those conditions are not justified.¹²¹

What one finds here is a very profound and important approach to law, which can be called, with apologies to Einstein, a general theory of legal relativity. Natural law cannot be universalized specifically because all creation is not in fact one homogenous universe, but a multiverse. Every kingdom has a law, yet it is a natural law, at least in the sense that it is consistent with the nature of the matter within that kingdom. A Mormon jurisprudence would recognize that many laws pertinent to this world are quite possibly irrelevant in the setting of another kingdom. Do laws against murder have anything to do with another world of immortal beings?

This point could be multiplied many times over. Metaphysically, Mormon thought uses time and eternity perspectives and realizes that justice may still be just, even if it is delayed. This diachronic factor solves a classic paradox of justice and mercy, of God being both just and merciful, for, as the prophet Alma explains, mercy resides in the fact that God stays his hand during a probationary time allowing people to choose to repent and accept the benefits of the grace and atonement of Jesus Christ. ¹²² Of course, only a God who exists and acts in time can do this, allowing such a stay in the execution of the demands of justice. ¹²³

A binary world is presumed in the opposites that constituted the Creation (dark and light, wet and dry, male and female), with both sides of these pairs of opposites being not only descriptive of the nature of this world, but also necessary to permit choice. As Lehi famously stated, "For it must needs be, that there is an opposition in all things." ¹²⁴ A Mormon metaphysics, therefore, would address and include such concepts as causation, determinism, fate, freedom, influence, addiction, and relinquishment of freedom, accepting as fundamental the axiom that human nature is changeable, both for better or worse:

And again, verily I say unto you, that which is governed by law is also preserved by law and perfected and sanctified by the same. That which breaketh a law, and abideth not by law, but seeketh to become a law unto itself, and willeth to abide in sin, and altogether abideth in sin, cannot be sanctified by law, neither by mercy, justice, nor judgment. Therefore, they must remain filthy still. 125

A Mormon jurisprudence would work from a basic understanding of human nature that recognizes the seed of divinity and therefore of eternal value in every human being, however faint it may sometimes seem.¹²⁶ The jurisprudence of Thomas Hobbes begins with the premise that human nature is evil and needs to be contained and controlled by benevolent ruling forces.¹²⁷ While recognizing that evil forces influence and shape human decisions and that the natural or mortal element in man stands in a state of enmity toward the immortal or divine, a Mormon jurisprudence still assumes that humanity is in essence beneficent and that most of the people most of the time will prefer to choose good over evil.¹²⁸

A Mormon jurisprudence would pluralistically place equal weight on rights and duties. In the United States, people speak often, and sometimes loudly, in behalf of rights: civil rights, human rights, legal rights, the right to bear arms, the right to assemble, the right to counsel. Less frequently, if at all, do people speak of duties. While I am a strong supporter of the Bill of (individual) Rights, I wonder if one should not begin to promote the idea of a "Bill of Communitarian Duties." I suspect that the twentieth century will go down in jurisprudential history as the century of personal rights (equal rights, voting rights, civil rights, etc.). I hope that the twenty-first century will become a century of legally recognizing and strengthening civic duties.

Ultimately, duty analysis turns on how people view other people. If other people are optional and all relationships are voluntary, duties are spineless. A Mormon jurisprudence, however, rejects the prevailing view of radical individualism and operates upon the fundamental assumption that all human beings are children of God, irrevocably brothers and sisters. In this view, other people are not optional. 129 Indeed, through the atonement of Jesus Christ, every human being may become fully exalted and receive all that he and his Father have. Moreover, these involuntary relationships may be sanctified by volitional, holy, and eternal covenantal bonds. This potent Latter-day Saint view supports not just ordinary but indeed robust views of communitarian social justice.

An ethics of merit and responsibility goes hand-in-hand with this Mormon self-perception, for no one will get to a state of justice by getting there alone. Permissiveness is not a blessing if it encourages self-destruction, and we mourn each loss as a loss of part of ourselves.

A pluralistic Mormon jurisprudence would reject the idea that all law can be reduced to economics. ¹³⁰ In fact, one cannot buy anything and everything in this world for money. This irreducibility transforms a jurist's approach to damages, equity, remedies, fairness, justice, and punishment. A Mormon jurisprudence will likewise make room for multiple theories of punishment, not just the one right theory or approach (as seems to be the premise in the exchange between Martin Gardner and Steven Huefner¹³¹). Individual circumstances and needs will call for the use of an arsenal of various punishments. A Mormon jurisprudence might even favor a talionic approach to punishment, on some occasions having the punishment match the crime. The scriptures are full of examples of talionic justice, especially in cases involving divine or natural justice. 132 As I have suggested elsewhere, under a Mormon jurisprudence, if a person litters the highway he or she would be sent out to clean up roadways. 133 If a person lies under oath, that person should not be allowed to hold positions of trust, such as service on a board or as a trustee. We might punish those who commit perjury by having the IRS audit their tax returns, a fitting penalty; since tax returns are filed under penalty of perjury, if one has lied on the witness stand, "the government might want to presume that such a person would also have likely lied on his or her tax returns."134

V. CONCLUDING COMMENTS

In conclusion, I come back to a few things I passed over quickly at the beginning of this Article. While one may agree with Dean Michael Young that the task of articulating a Mormon jurisprudence may be much more difficult and perhaps even riskier than people might have assumed, I do not think that people should be hesitant or reluctant in trying. Offering a Mormon approach need not be a "conversation stopper." Members of all faiths should be engaged in the ongoing process of understanding jurisprudence. Indeed, anyone who asserts a right or advances a worldview bears the duty to articulate the implications of their exercise of that right or of adopting that worldview.

Mormonism, of course, is a young tradition, little more than 175 years old. Think where Christianity was when it was only 175 years old. No Mormon Thomas Aquinas has appeared yet. Latter-day Saints still have much homework to do, and in this they will need the help of many intellectual friends. However, Mormonism is extraordinarily rich in potential. It is deeply devoted to both truth and goodness. How rich is the idea that people should become eventually like God (an idea not unique to Mormonism, as reflected in 1 John 3:2). Whatever a person's view of God's true character or characteristics might be, how much better the world would be if that person would strive to the extent possible in this present mortal experience to be like God.

The jurisprudential potential of Mormonism remains to be actualized. I mentioned several passages, such as the words of Alma, the founding Nephite chief justice, in Alma 42, regarding justice and mercy. A Latter-day Saint might see his words as jurisprudential matter unorganized and awaiting organization, and others may see these ideas as Wittgensteinian¹³⁵ notations; filled with choice kernels that in the Lord's time may blossom, containing nuggets that still need to be mined, and arrayed with loose gems that still need to be set.

Most of all, one may see in Mormon jurisprudence a potential to be pluralistic without degenerating back into chaos. In the postmodern world, Mormonism offers a logical alternative to the two prevailing paradigms—relativism and absolutism.

Postmodernism is heavily entrenched in relativism, despite the fact that relativism has its own philosophical problems.¹³⁶ Following Nietzsche and others, the relentless search for rationally based truth has been basically eliminated. Things are now "true" inasmuch as they correspond to their systems (for example, Wittgenstein's language games¹³⁷)—but there is no single system that dominates all other systems.

Based on this, what is true for one person can be false for another. Despite this entrenched relativism, however, few actually believe it when taken to its logical conclusion. For example, the New Testament states that Christ died on the cross. The Qur'an is equally emphatic that he did not. Few believe that the two statements can both be true, and hence people are absolutist in at least some weak sense of the word. But how is one to determine which of the two, or if both, are false?

The Enlightenment has failed in several important respects—unaided rationality cannot lead to ultimate truth. This failure has called into question whether there is ultimate truth. 138 But what replaced the mindset of the Enlightenment—namely, postmodernism—has plenty of problems of its own. This again is another one of the places where the Mormon worldview, and hence a Mormon jurisprudence, allows people to have their cake and eat it too. There is ultimate truth—in the Latter-day Saints view—in statements such as God exists; Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God; God speaks through prophets; the Bible contains the word of God; and so on. Though the ultimate goal, for Mormons and all other Christians, however, is to have every member of the human race hear and accept all ultimate truths, the emphasis for Latter-day Saints is not on immediately arriving at that truth and changing one's life instantaneously. The Latter-day Saints scriptures are replete with statements that those who continually seek after more light and knowledge are those who grow line upon line, 139 will increase in light and holiness,140 and will eventually enter into the rest of God. Those who continually seek further light and knowledge will not be blamed.

This allows a Mormon jurisprudence to create a mediating position between relativism and absolutism. Two mutually contradictory facts are not true in the sense that they both represent reality, but depending on the individual circumstances of each human being, what is helpful in the development of one person's spirituality might not be helpful to another's. Ultimately, of course, the judgment of how well we have done is left to God.

An analogy from Romans is useful: Paul compares in Romans 12 the church of Christ to a body. 141 Extending that analogy, the human race itself is a body, and not all have the same office. Though Latter-day Saints believe they have the fullness of the gospel, they do not equate that fullness with all truth, as was mentioned above by Brigham Young. 142 The Latter-day Saint Church teaches that the great thinkers and religious leaders of the world—Muhammad, Zarathustra, Lao Tzu, Socrates, and others—were sent by God to bring further light and knowledge to their respective peoples inasmuch as those people were ready to receive. 143 Consequently, Latter-day Saints hope to learn much from the teachings of such great men.

¹³⁸ The argument runs something like this: rationality cannot lead to ultimate truth; therefore there is no ultimate truth. This is obviously fallacious. Many postmoderns have thrown out the baby with the bath water.

This emphasis on doing the best one can, spiritually and intellectually, with what one has been given allows the Latter-day Saint to emphasize aspects of both the Enlightenment worldview, namely that there is ultimate truth, and the postmodern worldview, namely that what is "true" for one person might not be "true" for another, with the disclaimer that one must always be moving towards the ultimate truth inasmuch as it is revealed to him or her. Mormon thought is pluralistic without degenerating into chaos.

A pluralistic theology or jurisprudence should uniquely appeal to and serve the needs and interests of the ever-increasingly complex world in which various cultures, ideologies, interest groups, cultures, ethnicities, modalities, and religions abound. Indeed, it should serve the needs of all God's children, in every nation, kindred, tongue, and people. Is it too much to think that a Mormon jurisprudence might serve those ends even better than the other options that have been put on the jurisprudential table thus far?
